

“There is a ‘father factor’ in nearly all of the social issues facing America today. But the hope lies in the fact that children with involved fathers do better across every measure of child well-being than their peers in father-absent homes.” NFI

Is this the kind of father you want to be?

A nurturing parent who clearly understands and accepts the importance that his parenting skills have in developing the physical, emotional, intellectual, social, spiritual, and creative needs of his children.

A positive role model who works to build and maintain healthy and supportive relationships with his children.

A father who understands the unique contributions he brings to raising his children (i.e., the difference between “fathering” and “mothering”).

Aware of himself as a man and aware of the significant impact he has in his family.

In touch with his capabilities, his strengths, his limitations, his moods, and his feelings.

A man who takes care of himself: gets annual physicals, eats the proper foods, exercises to stay in shape, has a strong spiritual connection with his community, and chooses friends who reinforce his healthy choices.

We can help you get there!
